PRICE OF LIVING IN THE HIGH ALPS

The building crane, which has become the most striking feature of the urban landscape in Switzerland, is beginning to alter the mountain landscape as well. Districts of the Swiss Alps, which up to now have consisted of only a few disconnected small communities, are today becoming parts of planned, developing regions. The new highway, the new ski-lift, the new multi-nationally-owned hotel will diversify the economy and raise the standard of living in the mountain areas, or so many Swiss regional planners and government officials hope.

The mountainous area of Switzerland, which accounts for nearly two-thirds of the total area of the country and only 12 per cent of the total population, has always been the problem area. According to the last census in 1990, 1,750,000 people lived in the Swiss mountains. Compared with the rest of the 10 country, incomes are lower, services are fewer, employment opportunities are more limited and populations are decreasing. In fact, in only one respect do mountain districts come out ahead. They have more farmers, which many people do not consider to be an advantage. Seventeen per cent of the Swiss mountain population works in agriculture, in contrast to only 8 per cent of the total population of the country. The mountain farmers are a special breed of men. They work at least twelve hours a day in adverse weather conditions which kill most crops and which only a few animals will tolerate. About half of them work at some other job as well, leaving their wives and children to do the bulk of the farm work.

With all the present difficulties in working in the Swiss mountains, why should anyone resist the development of the mountain economy? The answer, as Andreas Werthemann, editor of the Swiss mountain agriculture magazine Alpwirtschaftliche Monatsblätter states, is that 'when tourism becomes too massive, farming disappears'. Therefore, in a country like Switzerland, where nearly one-quarter of the land is unproductive and which produces only 45 per cent of its own food requirements, all types of agricultural enterprises must be encouraged. However, in highly industrialized Switzerland, where mountain farmers are aware of the 'benefits' of city living, is it possible to maintain mountain agriculture and still solve the problems of mountain communities? The Swiss government has come to the conclusion that other kinds of employment in addition to farming must be emphasized. Yet whether it is possible to create other jobs that will not completely destroy agriculture is unknown.

21) According to the text, _____.

- a) the mountain farms of Switzerland no longer create a problem for the Swiss economy
- b) the number of people living in the mountainous area of Switzerland has been growing steadily
- c) the mountain farms of Switzerland are gradually becoming urbanized
- d) two thirds of the population of Switzerland live in the mountain farms

22) Which of the following is not mentioned in the text as one of the differences between the mountainous area of Switzerland and the urban centers?

- a) standard of living c) materials used to build houses
- b) employment opportunities d) public services

a) refuse to accept b) encourage c) support d) decide to favor

- a) Three quarters of the land in Switzerland is suitable for agriculture.
- b) Swiss mountain economy is no longer dependent on farming as tourism has become too massive.
- c) Swiss farmers produce almost half of the food requirements of the whole country.
- d) The weather conditions in the Swiss mountains make life difficult for the farmers.

- a) avoiding all types of enterprises in tourism
- b) introducing other kinds of employment rather than agriculture
- c) maintaining mountain agriculture
- d) making mountain farmers enjoy the 'benefits' of city living
